Select the extension, and then drag the downloaded .crx file to the extension page - so that you drag to the center of the page so that The version is 5, though, isn't quite clear — we can see that it is But it obviously doesn't show it as a 32-bit processor. In this case, we can safely assume that it is a 32-bit chip because it does not specify a 64-bit architecture. Choosing which file to download with that in mind, let's go back to our YouTube example above. We are going to see several versions of YouTube on APK Mirror and guess exactly what the download applies to my Pixel 2 XL. With the device information at hand, we know it's running a 64-bit ARM processor, it has a DPI of 560, and running Android 8.1. Processor type and Android version-arm64 and android 5.0+ are easy to match. But there is no specific option for 560dpi. Therefore, we have two main options to choose from: the most available DPI- in this case, 480, or Nodp. In this case, I recommend going with the Nodp version, as it includes all the resources available to cover the gamut of DPI. So why not choose this one regardless? Because of the file size- since it essentially has the resources to work on any DPI, it's a very large file. If you completely match your device's DPI, always go with it. Otherwise, you can also choose one that is a bit higher and fine. In terms of our testing, however, I'm not sure if the 480 DPI version would look as good as nofp downloads because the phone is 560 DPI. In that case, the larger file size is worth the tradeoff. It's very easy to learn the ins and outs of your device. And luckily once you understand this information you shouldn't worry about it again until you find a new phone. Phone.
